AMUSEMENTS. Solon Shingle" at the Broadway Theater. To go to the theater in such nights as we are enjoying-or suffering-just new, is to manifest remarkable courage. No person, we fancy, can doubt this, who has a realizing sense of the profoundly despondent state of the cotemporary thermometer. Courage, howbeit, is one of the virtues of the theater-going community; and hence, as we are glad to record, a large audience was assembled at the Broadway Theater, on Monday evening, to greet Mr. John E. Owens in "Solon Shingle." The greeting extended to him was gental and bearty. His first appearance was bailed with stormy and long-continued applause, and he was called before the curtain at the end of each act. It will be readily and correctly inferred that the occasion was very pleasant. Mr. Owens's Solon Shingle is the same that it ever was, and yet not the same. It is equally true to life, and equally amusing, yet it is ampler in substance, more buman, and more refined. The difference is due, in part to the revision of the piece, and in part to the more scrupulous art of the actor. In the old version of "the People's Lawyer," as formerly played by Hill and The Hon. James M. Scovel was to-day art by Charles Burke, and latterly by Mr. Owens. Solon The interest all day has been intense. Mr. Scovel's Shingle is merely a coarse, inquisitive, bungling counas an old man-and Mr. Owens has copied Burke. But, The President, in his speech, took high ground for in the new version of the play-which is attributed to the rights of mankind; for justice to the negro, and Mr. Iwens himself, and which is a vast improvement said that the Declaration of Independence was not on the old one-Solon Shingle is depicted, not merely as inqusitive, and garrulous, and bungling, and uncouth but is curiously generous and mean, noble and sordid, such practices were going on quite extensively, and in the latter part of September Gen. Woods, commanding the Department of Alabama, called Gen. Sheridan's attention to the matter, who issued secret orders to his subordinates, calculated to prevent such outrages. "Sik: The inclosed copy, in translation of a law just passed by the Cortes has considerable importance in a commercial point of view, and might not be understood at a distance without explanation.

"For a number of years past commerce in the article of Port Wine was liable to a certain geographical district north of Fortugal and regulated by various restrictions, which rendered it a monopoly in the hands of growers and speculators. The original law was, doubtless, intended to protect the purity of the wine but after some exportence it was found that the official certificates, which were necessary for the exportation of the wine, and which were applicable only to a particular area of territory, were used to cover growth outside those limits, and, in fact, were sold freely as a mercantile commodity. Consequently the aim of the restrictive policy was virtually destroyed.

"Repeated and persistent efforts were made of late years to remove all restrictions to free the commerce in this description of vice, as in others, and to allow the whole production of the Winho region, which is exceedingly fertile, to enter the markets of the world, each description of vice, as in others, and to allow the effects of the new policy will be to enlarge the commerce with the United States, and for that reason I have reason to believe that one of the immediate effects of the new policy will be to enlarge the commerce with the United States, and for that reason I have reason to be been that one of the immediate effects of the new policy will be to enlarge the commerce with the United States, and for that renear I have reason to be been that one of the immediate effects of the new policy will be to enlarge the commerce with the United States, and for that renear I have reason to believe that one of the immediate effects of the new policy will be to enlarge the commerce with the United States, and for that renear I have reas

He has more words to speak, and they are often more pointed. Mr. Owens person ates the character so as to suggest the whole, life-long can farmer, of what appears to us to be, distinctly, the New England pattern. His "make-up." to speak tech-nically, is perfect; his dialect is admirable; his portraiture of prying senility is wonderfully truthful. glad to observe, also, that he does not, as he formerly did, have maintained a large and constantly increasing sale, sus exaggerate the vulgar points in the performance. He no longer expectorates about the stage, nor cherishes his quid of tobacco, nor dwells with needless elabora t tion on his pet points. This is wise. No person of taste could possibly wish to see every poculiarity of such a this respect it stands alone. The evidence of Chemists and of man as Solon Shingle reproduced upon the stage. Mr. Owens did not always remem ber this, as he seems to do now. Yet, in one point, he might still increase the refinement of his acting. The allusion, which Shingle makes to "three cents worth of clams," and the picking of the teeth, in which be indulges while giving his testimony, are highly disagree-able and ought to be omitted.
